

I think that it would be a huge mistake to let this deal go through. at&t has shown over the years that they care more about being better than Verizon, rather than caring about its customers and their needs. over the years while tmobile has offered more lower and affordable prices; at&t has raised prices and has taken away unlimited data plans that are valued by millions on the tmobile network, while changing about the same rate as their once unlimited plan was and charging them more money if they go over their data limit. as opposed to tmobile which they just control the data speed should one go over their limit. I know that while the goal of any business is to make money, but if the business cares about its customers it should also not only offer competitive prices but also competitive customer service. while tmobile has been having network issues of one kind or another; their customer service has always been outstanding. While at&t on the other hand has had somewhat better coverage than tmobile; but their customer service is poor, and they have like i said before they have raised prices over the years just to see if they can get the same amount of money from a customer as Verizon gets, while taking away customer valued plans and have added penalties to their plans that would make many leave at&t regardless of the iPhone or not. the truth is they feel like they can make this bold step to remove customer valued plans that are enjoyed by the younger customers on their network simply... cause at one point in time they carried the most popular phone to many people and making them pay more and getting less just cause they had the iPhone and no one else did and no one else had the rights to carry it but them only. so i feel that no tmobile needs funding to improve on its network issues, but it should not be merged with a money hungry-customer neglected-opportunist company as At&t.